“ I look at his house every single day and it brings me such sadness. I want to deny any of this is real :(I felt a special bond with Ronnie... with living next door— I had his routine down to a science. I knew what time he got up, bathroom, walked Lucy to the trucks to do her business and back again, etc. We had so many over the fence conversations and so many times he did not understand WHY on earth I did the things I did. Ron was never afraid to speak his mind and told me I was a crazy cat lady! Of which he viewed cats as totally useless animals (ohhh Ron, lol). But when I got my chihuahua he (I believe) fell for her. My dog found her way to Ron EVERY time he was out in the yard. Many times I'd be yelling (like a crazy woman) searching for her and then I would find her sitting by or on Ron ... as he just sat quietly petting (not telling me where she was). He yelled at me all the time about having her on a leash and I yelled at him for not having Lucy in one...lol. I have a billion memories dating as far back as 40+ years... I will certainly miss all his funny and sarcastic meme's he sent me through messenger and all his super blunt statements. I loved Ron like a second pop... there is void in my heart right now.. I am so happy I am moving this month because I don't think I could continue to see his house empty . My heart is now with his family... knowing how hard it is to lose a dad... I am especially worried and sad for his one and only daughter. Seeing Amy over at his house constantly through the years and constantly watching over him since Marsha passed. Always checking on him and going places with him or bringing food to him... I've got to believe Ron died knowing how much his family loved him.

I'm very sorry for your loss. I didn't know Ron personally and may have met him once or twice from our mutual friends, Terry and Jim.
